

CHAPTER 1

A CHANCE ENCOUNTER

Glasgow, present day

"Look out! Coming through!"

"Oi!"

"Watch where you're goin', wee man!"

"Sorry!"

Daniel Holmes darted through the Saturday shopping crowds in Glasgow, pushing and twisting and weaving. His lungs burned and his legs ached, but he did not stop. He couldn't stop; Spud Harper and his gang were chasing him. And everyone in the children's home knew that if Spud Harper was after you, you didn't slow down.

Daniel wheeled left at a butcher shop, almost slipping on a blood-red puddle. He turned into a narrow street lined with old buildings housing fashion boutiques, restaurants and coffee shops. Carved stone angels and gargoyles seemed to watch the street from high above.

Daniel's head swung right to left. Where next? He wondered how far he was from the bus station. He imagined jumping on a bus headed to the coast, where he could stow away on a boat and escape from Glasgow and St Catherine's. Somewhere with no Spud Harper would be nice.

"Not crying for your dad?" Spud yelled at him from somewhere back among the crowds. "You were wailing like a baby in your sleep again last night. The whole home heard you! 'Daddy! Daddy! Don't die, Daddy!' Ha, ha! Don't worry, wee man, when we're through with you, you'll have something else to cry about!"

Spud and his gang were bigger than Daniel, and faster and stronger. Sooner or later they'd catch him. He sprinted across the street, jinked into the nearest shop and slammed the heavy door shut. He clutched at his chest and watched through the darkened glass of the door, crouching out of sight. He could hear Spud's gang shouting as they thundered past.

"Wher'd he go? Where is the wee weasel?"

"Must be up here!"

Daniel's shoulders sagged. He closed his eyes and breathed deeply. The air was infused with the jumbled perfume of furniture polish and dust, and something like melting chocolate. Then he opened his eyes, and for the first time became fully aware of his surroundings.

The shop was a cave of wonders. Everywhere he looked, Daniel saw something he wanted to pick up, to hold, to have as his own. Silver and gold and crystal gleamed and sparkled in the light of a spitting fire. Intricate wooden clocks and mirrors of varying size and splendour covered the walls. Tiny fish flashed like bars of copper in a glass tank. There were porcelain dolls and wooden soldiers; rusted swords; stuffed animals; columns of books as high as the ceiling; jewels that seemed to glow with a silvery light. A stuffed polar bear sat in one corner, eyeing the shop like a watchman. Even particles of dust, caught in a bar of sunlight, seemed to glow like stars.

"How did you get in here? We're closed!"

The voice startled Daniel. In the far corner of the room stood a grand desk with feet carved like an eagle's talons. Behind the desk sat a small man in a dusty suit. His wavy brown hair was wild and tangled, falling over his handsome face. On the desk in front of the man lay a battered book. His hand hovered over an open page, clutching a fountain pen. He stared at Daniel with eyes the colour of thunderclouds.

"Sorry," said Daniel. "Didn't mean to bother you. Someone's chasing me." As he spoke, his eyes were drawn to the book on the desk, which had begun to tremble against the dark grain of the wood, as if there was something in the pages trying to get out.

The man in the suit frowned. He glanced from Daniel to the book and back. Then he snapped the book shut, locked it away in his desk, and got up and marched past Daniel to the door.

"See?" he said, pointing to a sign hanging on the door that read CLOSED. "Closed." He tried the door handle, opened the door. "I could have sworn I locked it." He spun back to face Daniel, staring at him through narrowed eyes. "Who's after you?"

"Big boys. From my children's home."

The man raised an eyebrow.

"You are an orphan?"

Daniel nodded.

The fire snapped and cracked.

"What happened to your parents?" said the man.

Daniel thought this was an odd question for a stranger to ask, but he didn't want to be thrown back out into the street, so he answered.

"Dad was a fisherman. Died at sea. Mum only lasted a couple of years after that."

This seemed to satisfy the shopkeeper.

"And why are these big boys after you?" he said. "There must be a reason."

Daniel folded his arms. "Yeah, there is a reason. They're goons. Spud and his pals think they run the home. They take things from the other kids – important things, like reminders of their parents and stuff. And nobody ever stands up to them. But I couldn't take it any more. I followed them. I found out where they kept their stash. I got everyone's stuff back and I explained that if the other kids stick together, Spud and his gang can't get to them. Spud didn't like that."

The little man in the dusty suit jutted out his bottom lip and nodded, disguising a smile. "Ah. Bullies. I see." He wandered around from behind his desk. "What is your name?"

"Daniel. Daniel Holmes."

"Well, Daniel Holmes, I know how it feels to live life in the shadow of a bully. We have that in common."

"Really?"

"Mmm hmm. I'll tell you what. You can wait in here until you are sure Spud and his gang are gone."

"Yes, sir. Thank you."

"It's no trouble," said the man in the suit. "Now, if you'll excuse me, I have business to attend to."

He turned and wandered towards a velvet curtain of rich, deep crimson at the back of the shop. As he reached for the curtain, he paused.

"Daniel, do you have a favourite animal?"

"Animal?" Daniel thought for a moment. "It's a bit weird," he said, "but I like magpies. People say they're the cleverest of the birds. There's a rhyme about them..."

"Ah," said the man in the suit, "one for sorrow, two for joy?"

"Aye, that's the one."

"Very good," said the shopkeeper. He smiled to himself, then said, "Well, I must be off."

"See you," said Daniel. "Hey, maybe I'll come back and buy something from you one day."

A fleeting smile crossed the man's face. "Oh, I wouldn't be too sure. Return customers are very rare in this place."

And with that he was through the curtain and away.

Daniel peered out of the window, which was tinted sepia so that the outside world looked like an old photograph. Grey Glasgow rain had begun to fall in fat drops. Puddles were already gathering on the road.

Spud Harper and his gang were long gone, but Daniel was keen to have one last look around before he left. He wandered towards a table scattered with metal toy soldiers. He picked two of the soldiers up, imagining that one was himself and the other Spud Harper, and staged a fight between the two.

Daniel's soldier was about to throw Spud off the table when something startled him, a soft, fluttering sound. He dropped the toys and stared at the red curtain to the back of the shop. Another flutter. The curtain waved gently.

He edged forward, his heart racing. When he was close enough, he reached out a trembling hand and slowly ... gently ... touched the material.

A burst of red velvet, the sound of flapping wings, and two silver birds exploded from behind the curtain. Daniel ducked and spun, and the birds flew across the store and landed on a column of stacked books.

They were magpies. But they were like no magpies Daniel had ever seen.

They were made of brilliant, gleaming silver.

Every feather, delicate as a shaving of ice, reflected the flames of the coal fire. The silver magpies fixed him with shining ruby eyes, twitched their heads to one side.

"How?" whispered Daniel, treading softly towards them, though they did not shy away as he advanced. When he was close enough, he reached out a hand. "Are you real?"

His fingers touched upon the cool silver of one of the magpie's wings. The bird let out an indignant call and flapped away, leading its twin back towards the curtain. But when they reached the rich red velvet, the birds did not fly through. Instead, they exploded with a flash, and a shower of rubies rained down on the shop floor.

Daniel's mouth hung open.

"What's going on out there?" came the shop owner's voice from behind the curtain. "What was that sound? Nothing had better be damaged!"

Suddenly unsure of exactly what he'd seen, or what kind of a place he'd stumbled upon, Daniel made for the door. A little bell sang as he dashed out into the rain and down the street.

A moment later, the short man in the dusty old suit stepped from behind the curtain. He stared around the shop. Then he leaned over and plucked two of the magpie rubies from the floor, rolling them between his thumbs and fingers. His hands closed around the stones, and when they opened once more, the magpies were sitting in his palms, brilliant silver, almost glowing in the gloom.

The man in the suit released the birds and watched as they circled the shop before settling once again on a column of books. Then he smiled a wide, clever smile, and disappeared back through the curtain.

